

The list has been progressing splendidly thus far, owed almost entirely to my new job in San Francisco. I am still trying to limit myself to eating out for lunch just once a week, but what runs through my head in the days leading up to that glorious weekday is: 'how can I fit in another item on that dang list?'. And so, this past weekend, when I had nothing better to do, I of course began the extensive research into what <sup>To-Go</sup> place I should pick to eat. The winner today was the sentinel, a sandwich place on New Montgomery. The sandwich enshrined on the list of fame: corned beef with cabbage and gruyere. Unfortunately, however, I realized that the sandwich on the menu was not the corned beef with gruyere, but it was corned beef with Swiss.' Now, I've been looking at that menu for the past three days, and the corned beef with gruyere was nowhere to be seen.

8/09

The Sentinel

New Montgomery

corned beef with cabbage
and swiss

This leads me to the crux of this entry, which presents an interesting ethical (okay, its probably better to stick to a more appropriate word with less gravity-like "foodie") dilemma: If I don't eat the exact thing on the list, but it is similar - and the reason was because the real thing was unavailable, does it still count? You tell me.

But in any case, I'm checking it off. PFFFFT ...